Chariot racing was one of the most popular sports in Ancient Rome. The races were traditionally run in the late afternoon, so racers of the various color teams often wore very stylish shades to keep the sunlight out of their eyes. Even still, their paths were often quite erratic.

The race we're observing today features chariot drivers divided into five teams: blue, green, red, white and yellow. Because racers were forced into such close quarters, path crossovers were not uncommon.

Whoa, looks like we're heading for a photo finish! Too bad there won't be any photographers around for another few thousand years. No one can tell who wins the race!

In the end, who will decide who takes home the grand prize?
