

PUDDLES

Now, to get the boat moving, we are going to need to see nice, dark puddles of water. When you stroke well, vortexes are created behind the boat and it feels like a good one. If you have a bad stroke, you can wash out creating white foam and zero power. You can tell that the boat power is on when you see a vortex and the power is off when you see bubbles.

We crossed the same circle of the lake many times, but it is hard to tell which puddles belong to which time we crossed. We started from one side and went straight across. Even though we came out the other side a little jumbled and tired, we always added something to our row and that something kept everything in order. Putting it all together, what does it take to have dark puddles?

