The pyromancer, Typhon, was known throughout the land for his ability to control flame. He travelled from town to town, towing a case of “mystical supplies”.

His inventory space was organised in a grid format, comprising 25 rectangular and square compartments. Each compartment contained a single number that denoted its area; all cells formed part of a compartment. Many of the darkened compartments contained the pyromancer’s various items, powders, reagents and the like. In truth, the only thing he carried of any importance were his wands. All wands varied in length, but all were very thin, black rods with a white tip on each end, stored in appropriately sized compartments. The wands, arranged in increasing order, revealed the trick to perform his acts of apparent pyromancy. So advanced was the setup he had perfected that it took only three steps.
